Rabbis Urge Jews To Make Room In Synagogues, Centers For All-Day Schools

Leaders of Conservative Judaism urged the American Jewish community to make available unused facilities in synagogues and community centers to increase the number of Jewish all-day schools.

These leaders, meeting at Kiamesha Lake, N.Y., at the sixty-second annual convention of the Rabbinical Assembly, the international association of Conservative rabbis, noted "with concern" that many Jewish day schools were now "housed in crowded and inadequate quarters", reports the New York Times. The opening of additional day schools is being delayed by a critical classroom shortage, they said.

Rabbi Theodore Friedman, of South Orange, N.J., the assembly's vice president, said that "it would be a great crime for the American Jewish community to divert funds for new buildings as the day schools increase when there are thousands of classrooms available in our synagogues and Jewish community centers now being used for afternoon and evening activities."

He appealed to Jews to demonstrate a "high order of statesmanship" by offering the facilities of these institutions that can be utilized by all denominations — Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform.

Rabbi Friedman announced that plans were being made to build 100 more Conservative day schools in the next ten years. This appeal for the utilization of synagogues and community centers for Jewish education brought into focus a number of education problems that have confronted the American Jews.

Rabbi Jacob E. Segal, of Detroit, a key figure in the Jewish day school movement in America, stressed that the all-day schools were a major instrument for the development of "knowledgeable, professional, and lay leadership of the future."

These schools, he said, have an integrated curriculum that stresses Hebrew and classical studies, along with secular studies. The goal of a well-rounded Jewish education, Rabbi Segal said, reports the New York Times, "is synthesized with the sancta of democracy and integrated with the highest values of American democratic ideals and principles."

The total enrollment of Jewish education in schools of all types — the all-day, the week-day afternoon, and Sunday schools — numbers more than 550,000. Of this number, about 55,000 attend 280 all-day Jewish schools, the greater majority of which are under Orthodox auspices. An increasing number of the recently established all-day Jewish schools has been of the Conservative variety.

However, religious leaders have expressed deep concern that the future of Jewish education is jeopardized by the critical shortage of educational personnel on all levels of Jewish education — both formal and informal.

They explained that this shortage was owing in large measure to inadequate salaries for those who want to dedicate themselves to the teaching of Jewish youth in formal classrooms and to engage in youth work.

Jewish religious bodies have voiced strong opposition to Federal aid to religious education. They have stressed that it was the responsibility of Jewish welfare funds throughout the country to support the all-day Jewish school system.

Last year the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds voted to study community support of the all-day school system. In addition to community support, religious leaders in New York said that local Jewish groups must provide additional funds for scholarships and fellowships, says the New York Times, "which would enable gifted students to enter the teaching profession and to enroll in seminaries of their choice."

Israel Aids Brazil To Develop Farms, Water Resources

A technical assistance agreement was signed recently at Recife, Brazil, by the Governments of Israel and Brazil for the development of water resources and organization of cooperative farming communities in Brazil.

Foreign Minister Francisco San Tiago Dantas stopped there, on his way to Geneva, to sign for Brazil, says the New York Times. The agreement resulted from a visit last November by Isaak Levy, Director General of the Israeli Ministry of Agriculture, who is noted for his role in developing and controlling the use of Israel's scarce water resources.

Under the agreement, Israel will provide a staff of technicians to organize a search for underground water resources and give training in irrigation methods. Another group of technicians will help to organize a farming colony on the San Francisco River.

The colony will be an adaptation of an Israeli farm cooperative system in which each family owns its land and home but purchases, markets, plans production and uses heavy equipment cooperatively.

The Israeli program will be conducted through the Brazilian Federal Northeast Development Agency, through which United States Alliance for Progress funds are being channeled, in this case $33,000,000 for emergency projects in the area. One of the major objectives of the agency is to promote agrarian reform in the nine-state northeast area, where 25,000,000 people live.

Celso Furtado, director of the agency, and several of the Governors of the states in the region have expressed interest in the development of farming cooparatives through which modern agricultural techniques could be introduced.

The Brazilian Northeast is subject to drought. Vast potentially productive areas are not under cultivation or pasture because of irregular rainfall and lack of irrigation, says the New York Times. Living standards are low and the per capita annual income is less than the equivalent of $100.

Warsaw Remnant Opposes Plan For Historic Cemetery

Gesia cemetery, in Warsaw, Poland, a widely known Jewish burial ground, has become an object of controversy between the city government and its small Jewish community. Municipal authorities, following an urban redevelopment blueprint, propose to run a street through the southern part of the cemetery, says the New York Times. About 10 per cent of the 200-acre wooded area, covered by the graves of tens of thousands of Polish Jews buried in the last two centuries, would be lost to the renewal program.

Leaders of the Warsaw Jewish community, which numbers about 5,000, are resisting the project. They have told the city authorities that world opinion "would not understand" the destruction of any part of Gesia.

The proposed street has been marked on the planners' maps for several years. Last year the City Council was persuaded to postpone a final decision, but last month it decided to go ahead. The date for starting work remains indefinite, however.

Jewish residents fear that the new street will be only the first step in a process that would result eventually in the disappearance of Gesia. The cemetery occupies a sizable part of what is becoming a desirable section of the capital. It is surrounded on all sides by half-developed areas with sprouting blocks of apartments.

Gesia lies half forgotten behind its high brick wall. It is rarely visited except for an occasional funeral, or by someone coming to tend the grave of a relative. All but a handful of the graves lie neglected under the trees, overgrown by vines and slowly sinking beneath the layers of soil deposited by the years.

Many of the tombstones have been toppled, some by human hands as late as a few days ago. Near by are the technical school and a barracks for transient laborers, whose residents often scale the walls and sometimes desecrate the graves.

The aged caretaker recently was given a telephone so she could more readily summon the police to deal with invaders. "The damaging of the tombstones used to be pure anti-Semitism," she said. "Now I would say it is probably just hooliganism."

In its neglect, and its isolation from the bustling city, Gesia has an aura of remote history. It is, in fact, an important Jewish archive, says the New York Times. With many written records destroyed in the war, it is the only remaining source of information about many persons who played significant roles in Poland's Jewish community.

Woman Benefactor Gives 25 Paintings To 15 Museums

A collection of impressionist and more-modern paintings valued at $1,500,000 has been given to fifteen American museums and galleries. The collection consists of twenty-five works by Braque, Cezanne, Corot, Degas, Manet, Matisse, Renoir, Rouault, Seurat, and Utrillo.

The gifts were disclosed by Richard E. Deutsch, president of the Adele R. Levy Fund, Inc., named for his late mother, who owned the collection until her death two years ago, says the New York Times. Mr. Deutsch said the paintings were being distributed in accordance with her wish that the collection be given to various institutions, especially in smaller cities outside the East.

Mrs. Levy, who lived in New York, was the daughter of Julius Rosenwald, a Chicago philanthropist, and the head of Sears-Roebuck, mail order house. Four of the beneficiaries, however, are major galleries: The Metropolitan Museum, and the Museum of Modern Art in New York; the National Gallery in Washington; and the Art Institute, in Chicago.

Other recipients included Brandeis University; Oberlin College; and museums in Scranton, Pa.; Kansas City, Missouri, San Diego, and Los Angeles, Calif., and Portland, Oregon.

Calls For 3-Faith Honesty Drive By N.Y. Business Men

New York business men of the Jewish, Catholic and Protestant faiths were urged to join in a program to improve the moral climate of the community. The suggestion was made by Sidney W. Roos, retiring president of the New York Federation of Reform Synagogues, says the New York Times. He proposed that the representatives of the three faiths hold ethics seminars that might help to give "positive expression to the moral values they hold in common in dealing with each other on business, professional, and political levels."

Mr. Roos spoke at the twentieth-anniversary dinner-meeting of the Federation's assembly of delegates, held in the House of Living Judaism, 838 Fifth Avenue. Harry K. Gutman, a member of Temple Israel, of New Rochelle, N.Y., was elected to succeed Mr. Roos.

Mr. Roos, a partner and vice-president of the New York real estate firm of Williams & Co., has been president of the Federation for ten years. The Federation represents ninety-six Reform congregations in the greater metropolitan area and Connecticut. It is the regional body of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

Discussing the recently announced federal-state-city project for combating juvenile delinquency of New York's lower East Side, Mr. Roos said:

"All of this fine effort will have little meaning if these young men and women are to grow up in our city surrounded by examples of dishonesty. "I, as a business man and religious man, have been disturbed by the disclosures of corruption and illegality in the conduct of business and politics. It seems to me that on the national and political scene, a great city like ours has the obligation to point the way in setting standards of moral behavior for the rest of the nation."

A growth of both the Jewish population and synagogue membership in Manhattan during the last decade was reported by Rabbi Daniel L. Davis, director of the Federation.

Rabbi Davis attributed the growth mainly to changes in New York's East Side, with the building of new apartment buildings and cooperatives, particularly the huge housing projects on the lower East Side, says the New York Times. He said many elderly persons who had moved to the suburbs had returned to Manhattan because their children had grown up and married.

As a result of the population and synagogue membership growths in Manhattan, "New York City is the only place in the United States where the Jewish population in the urban area has not declined and synagogues have gained membership," he said.

All I.L.G.W.U. Leaders Elderly, Only One A Woman, Concern Members

David Dubinsky was elected to his eleventh term as president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union at Atlantic City, N.J. The 70-year-old labor leader, who has headed the union since 1932, was unanimously returned to office by a cheering convention. He had no opposition.

Louis Stulberg, a 62-year-old associate of Mr. Dubinsky for many years, was re-elected to his second term as secretary-treasurer, writes Stanley Levey, in the New York Times. In almost all other respects the top command of the union remained unchanged.

Only two new vice presidents were chosen for the twenty-three-man executive board, but the choice of one was of special significance.

The man chosen is Shelley Appleton, manager of the Union's 10,000-member Local 23. At the age of 42 he is the youngest man by seven years on the board, and, in the opinion of many, is destined for a still higher post. He is also Mr. Dubinsky's son-in-law.

The other new vice-president is Israel Breslow, head of Local 22, an organization of 19,000 dressmakers. Local 22 has traditionally held a seat on the executive board. Mr. Breslow is 52 years old.

The way was cleared for Mr. Appleton to take a seat on the board when Benjamin Kaplan, manager of Local 117, representing cloak operators in New York, resigned for personal reasons. His retirement had not been expected. The other opening was equally unexpected.

It developed when the nominating committee declined to rename Julius Hochman, a 67-year-old Union career man, as a vice-president. Mr. Hochman was formerly head of the Dress Joint Council in New York. In recent years he has directed the Union Label Department o fthe I. L. G. W. U.

Mr. Hochman made clear that he had been willing to run for re-election but that the nomination had been refused him. Actually, according to other sources, he could have had the designation had he been willing to step out before the next convention three years hence.

The election highlighted several internal situations that concerned some persons in the Union. One is the continued dominance of elderly leaders: Luigi Antonini, first vice-president, will be 79 years old next September, says the New York Times. Most of the members of the board are in their sixties and seventies.

The other matter for concern is that although 80 per cent of the Union's members are women, there is only one woman in the top leadership and there are relatively few women in lesser positions. The one on the executive board is Angela Bambace, of Baltimore.

Mr. Dubinsky made no apologies for his age. In fact he openly referred to it, an unusual practice in union circles. He said: "Age is not the determining factor. Some people are old in their young days; some people are young in their old days. The determining factor is the ability to serve. I feel that I can yet give service."

The garment Union leader said he had three reasons for accepting a new term as president even though he had thought he might like to "have a few years for my own life." They were:

"Where else can I get so much satisfaction for my son as from being president of the I.L.G.W.U.? In what field can I be more useful and more effective in doing things for other people? "The job is not done; there is more to be done", says the New York Times. The convention will meet next in 1965.

Juvenile Delinquency In Israel

BY ELISHEVA PELED (POLLACK), OF TEL AVIV, ISRAEL

The scourge of juvenile delinquency which has beset most of the civilized world has also struck in Israel. This melancholy sociological phenomenon can objectively be explained in a number of ways. The most convincing reason is to be found surely in the disintegration of fundamental and moral values as a result of war, catastrophes, widespread insecurity and anxiety, and above all, the scepter of the atom bomb which has given rise to the fear that life may come to a sudden end and which has fostered a mode of existence based on the maxim, "Let us eat and drink for tomorrow we die."

The world has been plunged into a frantic effort to bring living standards to dizzy heights and at the same time the energies of mankind are centered on the production of destructive weapons to protect political, military, and economic resources. The fact that the ingenuity of man has been concentrated on technological and material domains has been detrimental to moral values. The human situation has been complicated by the religious crisis, the challenge of Communism, and kindred movements, and by extreme nationalism.

The effect on the younger generation has been particularly harmful. Young people used to serve as pioneers in humanistic and idealistic causes. The youth of today, however, has suddenly been deprived of spiritual and moral anchors and has seen its former idols smashed to pieces. More than in the past, nihilism and cynicism have found fertile soil, particularly among intellectuals, children of "good families," and among "angry young men" of all denominations.

Among the many measures taken in the United States with a view to stem juvenile delinquency, that by the Boston-Cambridge Laboratory (Research-Institute) deserves special attention.

The disadvantage of all public institutions and organizations that have been dealing with the juvenile offender is that they have kept the latter in a state of dependence on society. This fact militates against a genuine and cordial relationship between the delinquent and those who try to mend his ways. When brought to court, the offender does his utmost, of course, to put himself in the best light. If he is condemned to serve a term of imprisonment, he knows that he would be at the mercy of the prison authorities, since they would be in a position to accord him privileged treatment, or even to let him benefit from parole, etc. If, however, he is paroled, he knows that he would depend on his probation-officer who at any time would be in a position to have him arrested.

At the very outset this state of dependency is subversive of a confidential approach on the part of the juvenile delinquent to the probation-officer or supervising institution, no matter how hard the latter may exert themselves to gain his trust. A juvenile offender is generally of a type lacking in self-reliance, fearful of any change, and suspicious of anyone seeking to reform his character.

The Boston-Cambridge Laboratory has made an important contribution in this field by fostering an atmosphere of genuinely free contacts between the juvenile offender and the Institute worker who has to deal with him. The contact with the juvenile offender is no longer made with a view to reform his character but with the intention to undertake useful research work into the problem of juvenile delinquency and into the mental and sociological factors underlying it.

In the course of time it has turned out that the mutual contacts in themselves, made during the research work, have become instrumental in leading the juveniles towards more desirable ways of life. The Institute deals primarily with severe cases of delinquency and with those deemed hopeless. Its main task has been to find out the hidden reasons behind juvenile delinquency; but it has turned out that this method of research can also be promising therapeutically.

The Institute employs psychiatrists, psychologists, educators, and social workers. There are three teams: one for outside work, a second for research; and a third for rehabilitation. The field workers establish contacts with leaders of hoodlum gangs — the so-called "heroes of the neighborhood" — as well as with potential delinquents among high school students and similar institutions and offer the delinquents the possibility of doing honest work which would enhance their sense of self-esteem and would bring also material reward.

At the same time, the team has to persuade the juveniles that the Institute is interested only in collecting material and not in reforming their characters. The research team conducts private conversations, public discussions, group therapy, and psychodrama, and juveniles have to perform a daily task which unconsciously has a positive effect on the youths who were hitherto accustomed to defying society and social duties. But the need to keep regular hours, like other people, causes them to modify their outlook.

On the basis of the research by Sheldon Glueck, of Harvard, the Laboratory attaches particular importance to the detection of delinquent proclivities prior to the age of 15. Society tends to be too lenient to mischief committed by children, without taking into account whether it stems from innocent motives or from criminal intentions, from natural and harmless motives or from negative and destructive tendencies which need special attention and strict supervision.

It is known, for instance, that many children are in the habit of secretly stealing money belonging to their parents, and we have to differentiate whether it is intentional theft or merely an act of rebellion or defiance. Every child undergoes periods of rebellion against his parents. But normally the child comes to recognize that he was in error and is willing to accept the moral burden.

It is altogether something else when the child is completely indifferent to moral considerations. Already at an early age it is possible to determine whether the child is able to distinguish between good and evil and on this basis to decide what course of action to pursue. Dr. Walter Miller, also of Harvard, stresses that one of the underlying causes in juvenile delinquency is when the family lacks the father-image with which the child could identify himself.

The Boston-Cambridge Laboratory has had considerable success in dealing with cases where the police, the court, and the probation-officer have failed. It has been able to establish contact with delinquents who seldom get caught, even though they are actually at the head of gangs and delegate other children to commit offenses. These gang-leaders are as a rule unknown to the police, and even when the authorities have an inkling about their activities, they are not in a position to prove their guilt and thus are not to communicate with the gang-leaders or to influence and alter their outlook on life.

Juvenile delinquency in Israel has fortunately not reached the alarming proportions it has in other countries, especially in the United States. The number of juveniles involved hitherto in prostitution, rape, and narcotics was relatively small. The problem is nonetheless a cause for public concern. Whereas crime among adults has tended recently to diminish (in certain categories as much as by 25%, and in theft and burglary by 18%), juvenile delinquency in 1959 increased by 14%, as compared with 1958. The number of criminal offenses committed in 1959 was 64,000, as against 54,000 in the preceding year. In 1960, the number of juvenile delinquents was over 10,000 (including 817 girls).

Youths under 16 constituted one-fifth of the total delinquents in the country. Out of 8,500 files opened last year against persons in this age category, about 97% of those charged were found guilty by the court. Many of the delinquents are members in youth movements, high school boys and girls who have not known poverty and want. What is even worse — few of them recognize and acknowledge the gravity of their offenses.

New ways, however, have been found to help the young offender turn a new leaf. Boys between the ages of 9-16 and girls from 9-18 can only be tried by a juvenile court. A juvenile offender is no longer answerable to offenses committed beyond a period of six months. The length of his sentence cannot be decided by the judge; it is determined in the reformatory on the basis of the offender's behavior. The trial is conducted behind closed doors, and only the probation-officer and the press are allowed to attend. No fingerprints are taken, except in grave criminal cases, e.g. murder, or manslaughter.

As long as juvenile delinquency affected only the poor classes, the general public did not display much interest in the problem. But this was changed when the evil began to spread to the upper strata of the community and when existing machinery for dealing with the problem was shown to be ineffective. We are now confronted with young people from better families, for whom the basis for deviation is not poverty but abundance, not lack of opportunity but spiritual and cultural emptiness.

Well-to-do parents neglect the mental development of their children because they are so absorbed in the pursuit of pleasure, just as poor parents fail in this respect because they are exhausted and overwhelmed by the struggle for livelihood. In both cases the children grow up not as collaborators with life, but as enemies of society, and in both cases they are prevented from developing their "ego" and "super-ego."

From the point of view of the health of society, the endeavor to eradicate the evil should begin at the early stages of education, and it is primarily the task of teachers, educators, psychologists, and psychiatrists. At the same time it is abundantly clear that the important thing is not to sermonize or exhort, but to establish and to inculcate enduring spiritual and moral values. As in all spheres of education, the key to the child's improvement lies with the adults. Before the young generation can acquire new values, there must come a revaluation within the family and in public life.

Modern educators generally recognize that a child should not be treated as a mere object upon which to exercise authority, and that he must become an active

Wanted: A Family Tie — Can You Help Here?

Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Montreal, in the J.I.A.S. News, calls attention to the following case which was referred to JIAS about one year ago:

"I am sure you understand my position and realize how anxious I am to find some relatives. I would like to see their faces, would like to know whether I look like my father or mother."

These words were written by Helena Korczyski. Helena was born in Lwow, Poland, on January 2, 1940. Her parents were believed to be Julius Lewis (Levin) and Solomea. When the Nazis began their campaign of deporting the Jews from Poland, the Lewises bundled up their daughter, Helena, and left her with friends, Mr. and Mrs. Korczyski. Mr. and Mrs. Lewis were subsequently killed in a raid on the Jews.

Helena lived with her adopted parents, the Korczyskis until their divorce, and continued to live with her adopted mother until the latter's death.

In 1959, after a separation of eleven years, Helena met Mr. Korczyski in the street and he took her to his home. Helena writes, "... his (second) wife met me and in his presence told me that I am not his child, — that I am a Jewess. 'Your father has taken you because he has pity on you and he has no intention to bring up a Jewess', and this was the end of our conversation".

Shocked and distressed, Helena left the Korczyskis, suddenly feeling lost and alone. "I do not know whether you would understand what a feeling I have in my heart. I would like you to understand that I have always been convinced that I am Polish . . . and suddenly one day I am informed that I am of an entirely different nationality. I have remained suddenly alone in the world".

Helena is now married and is living with her husband in very poor circumstances in Wroclaw, Poland.

From the time that Helena was informed of her Jewish origin, she has been trying to find some relatives, and in her search she was referred to JIAS.

It is believed that Helena's real mother, Mrs. Solomea Lewis, had a sister living in America.

It would be appreciated if anyone knowing the whereabouts of relatives of the late Mr. and Mrs. Julius Lewis (Levin), would kindly contact the Location Department of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Service of Canada, 4221 Esplanade Avenue, Montreal, Quebec, Telephone — VI. 4-9326.

What Happened To Discipline?

A former Royal Air Force medical director says co-educational schools and early marriages help cause alcoholism and juvenile delinquency. Sir Philip Livingston told the annual meeting of the British Columbia Alcoholism Foundation, in Vancouver, B.C., that, "It's common knowledge that smoking, drinking, and sexual intercourse are blandished as the passports to manhood. It is the inevitable legacy of mixed education."

Sir Philip said anti-social tendencies started by mixed education, poor discipline, and lack of respect for law were perpetuated by child marriage, reports the New York Times. Child marriages complicate the problems for the individuals concerned and set the stage for broken homes and the production of more delinquents, he added.

Sir Philip suggested that marriage be held off until the age of 25 for men and 23 for women. Discipline in the school, home, and in society in general, he said, seemed to have disappeared from Canada. "The result is a situation in which the immature and ill-controlled can cast defiance at the law."

partner in the educational process. It is up to the child to make use of his own resources and to bring forth what is inherent in him, so that he can act in accordance with the values he has acquired. And a "partner" is somebody you reckon with and whose will and viewpoint you take into account.

An important contribution in this field has been made in Israel by the prison authorities at Tel Mond in cooperation with the neighboring village Kfar Haro'eh (a religious settlement with a talmudical college named after the late Chief Rabbi Kook). The inhabitants of Kfar Haro'eh undertook to devote one day a week to meet the young people from the said prison. They drew up a program which included the distribution of books, lectures, films, sports, artistic events, etc. At a later stage, the prison authorities and the villagers embarked on a still bolder experiment.

The "pupils" (as the young prisoners are rightly called at Tel Mond) obtained a day of leave which they spent in work and play with the families of the village. The experiment was an outstanding success. Not a single pupil used the opportunity to escape. All returned to their institution at a proper time with enhanced spirits. The pupils themselves gave eloquent testimony of their appreciation and gratitude in letters and other forms of expression.

The success of the experiment is a tribute to the authorities at Tel Mond who insisted that the reform of character can best be achieved by fostering the cooperative instead of the punitive approach. Today we know that in order to be able to act creatively, men must develop a positive attitude towards life and must find joy and interest in it. This has been well understood by the Tel Mond people. It has been shown that it is impossible, even under prison conditions, to bring forth in the delinquent the feeling that he is not completely under the yoke of external authority.

Israel has not yet made full use of the enormous possibilities inherent in group psychotherapy. When the young delinquent takes part in a circle, he is enabled to see his own problems more clearly and vividly through the mirror of other persons and other experiences. If he views his own life in isolation, he tends to excuse himself, even if he confesses to his error. But the group enables him to acquire an objective criterion with which to judge his life and conduct.

The guidance of parents is also of paramount importance. It is necessary to give the parents a better understanding of the spirit behind the acts of their children, particularly since the development of the child depends to a great extent on how the parents react to his behavior. Organizing groups of psychotherapy for parents will help the latter to understand themselves and to see their own motives and hidden aims in respect to their children. Unfortunately, the child is seldom in a position to satisfy the frustrated hopes of his parents; and yet the parents continue to insist unconsciously that he fulfill their expectations.

It is highly desirable to establish in Israel a laboratory on the lines of the Boston-Cambridge Research Institute. Such a laboratory will require a considerable outlay. But the burden is worthwhile. It is noteworthy, for example, that the budget of the Education Depart-

Jewry In Constant Search For Leaders, Speaker Tells Congress Convention

"Jewish community organizations must broaden their scope if they are going to meet the ever-increasing responsibilities and changing problems with which they are faced," said Julian Freeman, of Indianapolis, Indiana, addressing the Canadian Jewish Congress Convention at the King Edward Hotel, in Toronto. Mr. Freeman is co chairman of the National Governing Council of the American Jewish Congress; and vice president of the National Foundation for Jewish Culture.

"During the last decade", Mr. Freeman declared, "the Jewish community has been faced with major changes at home. There has been a growing concern with all phases of mental health, vast changes in medical programs, greater community responsibility for Jewish education, and a broadening of community interest in Jewish culture. These needs are never static and it takes the most dynamic of programming, both on a national and local level, to meet these changing needs. This has resulted in dramatic changes in the very reason for being of many Jewish agencies."

Recalling that it is a basic tenet of Judaism to meet communal needs collectively, Mr. Freeman declared that: "The present communal service structure is an outgrowth from the first settlers and we have had to face up to our responsibilities towards the casualties of our social and economic system.

"The Jewish community is in constant search for leaders and it is important to mobilize the best leadership available from business, industry, the professions, and clergy. These leaders must have a knowledge of the whole panorama of Jewish interests and needs. Their devotion to the needs and that knowledge will not lessen their devotion, it can only increase it.

"In many communities we are having trouble with fund-raising. It is time to realize that the budget of 1948 does not apply to 1962 and our appeals must reflect the dynamics of the situation. We are responsible for more than relief overseas. We must plan our fund-raising. We need structure so that we have the mechanism necessary for our cooperative voluntary effort. We need leadership for without it the structure, no matter how magnificent, is but an empty shell.

"In North America Jews have grown into a large and wealthy community and have developed a tremendous pattern of social and education institutions. They have also helped tremendously in many fields in helping to establish the State of Israel. The Jewish community has become an integral part of North America and for most of us we no longer rush to acculturalization and acclimatization, because we feel we belong. Among the young there is a thirst for Jewish knowledge and Jewish background. There is a drive to escape from the usual Juvenile Judaism to a true appreciation of the basic concepts. We are not disintegrating as a group. We are definitely coalescing. We form a recognized religious group of the milieu."

West Germans Ask World Jewish Congress To Aid Hunt For Witnesses Against Nazi Killers

In a major effort to bring to trial Nazis responsible for the massacre of Jews in six of the largest concentration camps and ghettos, the West German authorities have asked the World Jewish Congress in New York to help trace eye-witnesses.

Anyone who witnessed atrocities in Sachsenhausen, Buchenwald, Przemysl, Dora, Dvinsk (Duenaburg) and the city and district of Lublin is asked to communicate with Dr. Nehemiah Robinson, at the World Jewish Congress, 15 East 84th Street, New York, N.Y.

The criminal investigation in regard to Przemysl is being directed against the following 28 members of the Security Police:

Bennewitz, Reisner (Reisener), Stegemann, Benthin, Wolf, Brandt, Timme, Mueller, Weichelt, Kajtasz; City Commissar Gieselmann, Chief of Labor Josef Schwamberger; Preuss, Breitlow, Mademann, Schwerhoff, Grusa, Schimang, Schroeder, Gerlach, Gottschling, Nickalik, Lanbertz, Nikel, Buchholz, Ludwig, Schubert and Maennlich.

Sachsenhausen: Witnesses are sought in particular against the former SS-Oberscharfuehrer Otto Kaiser, who in 1939-1942 was block leader in Sachsenhausen, at first in the Jewish block of the small camp and later in the "isolation block". He is suspected of a multitude of murders. His picture is available.

Testimony against any other criminals of Sachsenhausen is also invited.

Dora: Witnesses are sought, in particular, against the former SS-Oberstormbannfuehrer Bischoff and the SS-Oberscharfuehrer Sander, who are accused of multiple murder, but also against any other of the Dora criminals. Pictures of Bischoff and Sander are available.

Buchenwald: Witnesses are required, in particular, against: Otto Wolfgang, Otto Barnewald, Prinz Josias zu Waldeck, August Bender, Anton Bergmeister, Arthur Diezsch, Hans Eisele, Phillipp Grimm, Heinrich Hackmann, Gustav Heigel, Peter Merker, Guido Reimer, Helmut Roscher, Albert Schwarz, Walter Wendt, Franz Zinnecker.

Dvinsk (Duenaburg): Nazi victims who were in Dvinsk between July, 1941, and October, 1944, are sought. Those accused in the murder of the Jews of Dvinsk and surrounding localities are, in particular, the former SS-Hauptsturmfuehrers Guenther Tabert and Eberhard Schuele.

Lublin: Survivors of the city and district of Lublin are wanted as witnesses against the Nazi criminals of the region. The criminals were either members of the Security Police (Sicherheitspolizei) and SS or members of the Order Police (Ordnungspolizei). Witnesses are needed against criminals from both categories.

The Way It Is In Algeria And The Struggle To Begin Life Anew In France

BY IRVING R. DICKMAN, PUBLIC RELATIONS DIRECTOR OF THE JOINT DISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE, IN NEW YORK

"No matter what other Algerian Europeans may do, the Jews cannot and will not return," the Toulon Jewish community leader says flatly. "Too many feel that if they go back they will only be caught between the two sides and —", and he brings his hands together with a bang. There are a sizeable number of observers in France today who are predicting that, always barring new outbreaks of violence, the mass exodus of Europeans from Algeria may slow down and even come to a halt before the end of the first month of Algerian independence. There are even a few who will go so far as to predict a return movement to Algeria by the end of 1962.

In a picture which changes daily, everyone searches for signs and portents. There are many, even if the meanings are not always clear. Go out to Marignane, Marseilles' airport, and you will see plane-loads of passengers (chiefly men) flying to Algeria. Go to the docks and you will see family after family, mothers, children, and grandparents, where the husband and father has remained behind.

Check the most recent figures available, and you find that only 25 per cent of the Algerian repatriates have thus far filed applications for the French Government's repatriation allowance. But, four out of every five who have filed for this allowance are Jews, although Jews are estimated to make up only about ten per cent of the repatriates, a clear indication that most of the Jews have no intention of returning to Algeria.

Rabbi Maurice Edery, the young Moroccan-born leader of Toulon's Jews, puts it this way: "Perhaps the Jews of Algeria have a certain nostalgia for the way life used to be. But that life has now disappeared forever, and I do not believe they can ever go back." And Dr. Jean Marx, the president of the Jewish community of Avignon, adds: "At this moment I do not know of any Algerian Jews who are thinking of returning. They have lived in terror for many years. Now all that is behind them. Why should they go back?"

Conditions vary greatly. In Avignon, according to Dr. Marx, every repatriate gets his money as soon as he arrives ($100 for the head of the family and $40 for each dependent). In Toulon, however, Rabbi Edery reports that while all have registered, no one has yet received his money. Many of the newcomers have been receiving cash grants from the community to tide them over the emergency.

The impact on a community like Toulon can perhaps best be judged from the fact that of the 350 Jewish families now in the city, 80 to 100 families are Algerian repatriates, of whom 30 have arrived during the last six weeks. At the end of World War II, there were only some 80 families in the city. The first newcomers began to arrive from Morocco and Tunisia in 1954. Some 40 families came immediately after the Bizerte incident last July.

One of those who left Tunisia after Bizerte was Mardouche (Mordecai) Ditchi, who worked as a tailor at the French naval base. Ditchi is far luckier than most Tunisian arrivals. Because of his experience, he got a job almost immediately at his old profession in the Toulon naval base. He earns NF 400. (about $80) a month. On this salary he supports himself, his wife, two children, his mother, and an aged aunt. All of them are living in an apartment which consists of a single bedroom, a dining-room, and a kitchen, for which Ditchi pays NF 70. — ($14) a month. He was very fortunate to get the apartment. It was in a building owned by a member of the Jewish community, and was formerly a store-room. Ditchi painted and fixed it up himself. His brother is much less fortunate. He earns about $70 a month, lives with his wife and two children in one room, without running water. For this he pays $24 a month.

Aid for both Tunisian and Algerian newcomers in Toulon has included clothing and food as well as cash. The funds come chiefly from the Fonds Social Juif Unifié, the French Jewish communal body, which receives a sizable part of its support from the Joint Distribution Committee, with funds provided by the United Jewish Appeal. Toulon is only one of the many communities throughout France which have received an influx of Jewish newcomers during the past several years. The impact has been felt particularly in the cities and towns of the Midi, France's Mediterranean area. Lyons, Grenoble, Nimes, and other towns are continuing to receive newcomers daily. In Carpentras, the six century-old synagogue, closed in 1922 when the last of the town's Jews left, has now been re-opened to serve a new Jewish community.

Avignon, a city of 75,00, now has nearly 2,000 Jews. Of the 300 families, more than one third are North Africans who have come in the past two years. In the last three weeks alone, there has been an influx of 50 Algerian Jewish families. They have joined a community which traces its history back to the fourth century C.E.

The first Algerian newcomers presented no assistance problems, according to Dr. Marx, who is not only head of the Jewish community, but president of the Consistoire Israelite of the Vaucluse Department of France. They were in most cases well-to-do, with means of their own. The most recent arrivals, however, are from among the poorer elements of Algerian Jewry. Included also are a number of families where the father has remained in Algeria.

Many of these newcomers have had only the repatriation allowance to live on during their first days in Avignon. However, jobs are plentiful. In addition, the regional authorities have attacked the refugee problem vigorously, even requisitioning apartments for the new arrivals. Nearly all of the North African newcomers expect to stay on in France, according to Dr. Marx, although a number of Algerian families have already emigrated to Israel.

But if conditions in Avignon are relatively good, conditions in the other towns of the Midi are generally not so favorable. Algerian Jews are entitled to a wide variety of services by virtue of their French citizenship. Tunisian Jews, however, while permitted to stay in France by a sympathetic French Government, have a much more difficult time. Many, particularly while they are waiting for work permits, depend on cash grants from the Jewish community, often no more than NF 60 to 100 ($10 to $20) a month.

And as the continuing influx from Algeria aggravates the already-existing scarcity of housing, future waves of migrants may have an even more difficult time ahead of them.

ment of the Tel Aviv Municipality assigns the sum of 10,000 Israeli pounds annually for the repair of school window panes smashed by pupils in the course of the school year. The damage to public property caused by juveniles in this country is estimated at half a million pounds per annum. Israel's young have too much free time at their disposal, and not all of them know how to utilize their leisure constructively.

The upkeep of a juvenile delinquent in prison costs a lot of money and this factor must also be taken into consideration. The establishment of an Institute will cost the State of Israel much less than the damage caused as explained above. The Institute will not only help the community to deal with the young delinquent, but it will also play an important part in re-educating and rebuilding his character. It will contribute to our knowledge in the field of education. It will also enrich public knowledge of the factors conducive to delinquency in general, and to juvenile delinquency in particular. It will show us the ways and means of eradicating this evil from our midst. The task is of particular significance for Israel, since it is engaged in the goal of ingathering of Exiles and in the mission of becoming the beacon of light for world Jewry.
